

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This dissertation has been a real exercise of globalization. More than one copy of Harrison White's Identity and Control has accompanied me to places such as San Francisco, Tallahassee, Amsterdam, Dublin, and now, Gunnison, Colorado. My doctoral committee, originally based in Tallahassee, now spans two continents, and four US states. I would like to thank first of all this committee for helping me imagine, execute, and keep this project together over the last three years.

Lawrence Hazelrigg, my major professor and advisor for most of my graduate education and directing member of this dissertation, deserves my sincerest appreciation and respect. He has been a persistent advocate and critical supporter of my intellectual meandering throughout my time at Florida State, and was the first to introduce me to Harrison White.

Thanks also to Harry Dahms, who first channeled my interests in critical theory, and opened up the black box of what sociological theory is, or should be.

Allen Imershein has brought a much-needed strain of critical realism to a number of my intellectual endeavors (including this one) and deserves credit for helping me tighten up some of the arguments of this work.

Outside member Steven Klees gets my thanks and appreciation for his kind assistance over the course of this project in spite of his relocation, and for his personal interest in issues relating to critical theory.

David Brain at New College was the first to get me into sociology, and his continual support over the years has been crucial to my development as a scholar. I would also like to extend my thanks to the Department of Sociology at Florida State University, which helped to support me through my graduate education. I would specifically like to thank J. Michael Armer, Larry Isaac and James Orcutt, for playing formative roles in my development as a teacher and scholar.

Friends and family should also be mentioned, those close to me who have for too long suffered my moods and unexplained absences into the world of “theory” while I worked on this project. Thanks to the Harrison clan — Jenny, Mike, Lucy, and Esther— and relatives across the Atlantic — Leif, Norah and Norman Haug, George Harrison, and Jane Tate. I would also like to acknowledge the following comrades for accompanying me on this journey: Taylor Abel, Wayland Beckham, Richard Butgereit, Joe Caffentzis, Roy Carr, Jr., Jason and Katherine Coleman, Matt Davidson, John Farnum, Ed Freeman, Nicole Marie Ganzekaufer, Glen Gates, Dennis Gephardt, Chad Goldberg, Joe Grabowski, Michael T. Glantz, Jennifer Granick, Rosa Greenbaum, Liz Greico, Harry Hanbury, John and Sherry Jackson, Sven Johnson, Allen Joseph, P. Adam Kelly, Tom Lehman, Leif Meneke, Daniel “Ed” Moore, Jen Pemberton, Lars Peterson, Mike Ross, Buck Rogers, Robert Smith, Hosanna Soler, Rich Templin, Tina Terrill, Rick Wilson and Jonathan White.

And in memory of friends who I have lost in the interim: Frank Cooper, Patrick Denny, Andy Hunt, Peter Weiss and Mark Yaisley — all smart young men who died for stupid reasons way before their time.

I would also like to thank Peter Bearman, Matthew Bothner, Ronald Breiger, Craig Calhoun, Nancy Fraser, Dean Gerstein, Mark Granovetter, Eric Leifer, Joel Levine, Ann Mische, Michael Schwartz and Charles Tilly, all of whom were gracious enough to answer my emails, and some of whom I visited with while working on this dissertation.

Finally, a word of gratitude must be expressed to the man himself — Harrison C. White — who has supported (albeit quizzically and at a distance) this project almost from the start, and whose character and warmth I hope to have at least partially captured in this work.
